

Election Administration: A Guide to State and Federal Authority

September 2026

This guide is produced by the Office of the Secretary of State (OSOS) and the Office of the Washington State Attorney General (AGO) to support county election officials in understanding legal authorities, processes, and considerations related to potential federal interactions with Washington state elections. This material is intended for general informational and preparedness purposes only and does not constitute legal advice.

A message from Secretary of State Steve Hobbs and State Attorney General Nick Brown:

Safe and secure elections are the core of our democracy, and as state officials, it is our duty to partner with you to ensure Washington's elections are protected. In the event of any attempted interference that may affect elections, we are prepared to take action and support your critical work however we can.

With that in mind, we have compiled guidance for how our county partners — and our offices — can respond to any scenarios that may interfere with voters' rights or election administration. While we hope this guidance will prove unnecessary, this booklet is available as a resource should these situations arise.

Thank you for your dedication to supporting safe, secure, and accurate elections in our state.

State authority and role in election administration

The states have played the primary role in administering elections — including federal elections — since the founding of the country. The Constitution empowers state legislatures to prescribe the “Times, Places and Manner of holding” congressional elections. Art. I, § 4, cl. 1. While Congress may pass laws concerning federal elections, the Supreme Court has made clear that the “default” for administering congressional elections belongs to the States. Foster v. Love, 522 U.S. 67, 69 (1997).

In Washington, our elections are primarily administered by each county, subject to the oversight and supervision of the OSOS. As the chief elections officer, the Secretary of State is responsible for supervising state and local elections and certifying the results of state primaries and general elections. The OSOS also sets statewide election standards and security practices for elections, maintains statewide election systems, supports the administration of voter registration, and works in partnership with county election officials to ensure elections are conducted securely, accurately, and in accordance with state and federal law.

As the chief legal officer of the state, the Attorney General provides legal advice to the OSOS and represents the office in elections-related litigation, including challenges to OSOS systems, procedures, or certification. The Attorney General also represents the state’s interests as a sovereign, including in litigation challenging federal executive action that seeks to unlawfully usurp state and local control of elections.

Federal investigations of election officers and offices

Historically, federal law enforcement has taken a supporting, behind-the-scenes role in elections and has avoided overt investigatory actions that could be seen as political interference in an election. In recent months, some local elections officials have expressed concern that election workers may face confrontation with people purporting to be federal personnel investigating local elections, including at voting centers or other facilities.

A federal investigation can take many forms, including a verbal request for an interview or documents, a letter request for documents or information, a judicial or administrative subpoena, or execution of a federal search warrant. It is important to know your rights to ensure you comply with your legal obligations in each circumstance, do not obstruct a lawful investigation, while also seeking to minimize any negative impact of these events on the administration of a safe, secure, and accurate election.

This is not legal advice. You should consult your counsel, the OSOS, and the AGO if you or anyone in your office are contacted by a federal agent or if you learn of a federal investigation.

State and federal law make certain election-related information confidential. Whether materials can or must be disclosed to the federal government will depend on what information is requested and how it is requested.

Tip! A request for voluntary cooperation could be a signal of a larger investigation and the possibility that federal agents will attempt to seek a subpoena or search warrant. But it could also be an attempt to gain unauthorized access to election equipment. Providing prompt notice to your counsel, the OSOS, and the AGO will help in understanding the scope of the investigation, and provide time to take legal action if possible and prepare for the possibility of additional law enforcement action.

A. Federal personnel you may encounter

As elections officials, you may be confronted by individuals who claim to be federal employees or officials, including federal law enforcement agents. This may include:

- Election monitors from the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ)
For decades, the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division has sent election monitors to voting locations nationwide to assess state and local compliance with federal civil rights voting laws. These monitors have no special federal authority to enter election facilities — their rights are akin to the general public. Historically, DOJ monitors have observed election activities with the consent of local officials. They have no special rights to enter election locations unauthorized, to talk with voters present, or to interfere with the conduct of voting.
- Congressional election observers
Congress may send election observers pursuant to the Confirmation of Congressional Observer Access (COCOA) Act, 52 U.S.C. § 21083a. These observers are entitled to greater access than members of the public or DOJ monitors, including accessing voting, tabulating, canvassing, and certification areas. They may ask questions of officials and workers but still cannot handle ballots or election equipment or otherwise interfere with officials' ability to carry out their duties.
- FBI or other DOJ personnel conducting an investigation
Agents from the FBI or other DOJ personnel may attempt to conduct investigations at election locations. As described below, they may present authority to access certain locations pursuant to subpoena or warrant or other court order.
- Department of Homeland Security (DHS) investigators
There have been recent examples of DHS personnel, including U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), at the polls in other states. DHS personnel typically do not have judicial warrants or court orders allowing them to access information but may have administrative subpoenas.

B. Verbal requests for interviews or documents

If any of these individuals present themselves and ask for consent for an interview, or for the voluntary provision of documents, you can consider the following actions:

- Verify the identity of the federal agents or observers.
- Verify that the agents are making a verbal request for consent and that the agents do not have a subpoena or search warrant.
- Determine the scope of the request, including whether the request seeks non-public election materials or to access non-public locations.
- Once you are certain that the agents are making a verbal request only, consider telling the agents that you need to discuss the request with your counsel before consenting to an interview or voluntarily producing documents.
- Contact the OSOS and the AGO.

Others working in your office may consent to an interview, may refuse to be interviewed, or may tell agents they will only be interviewed in the presence of counsel.

Unless they are authorized to do so, those who work in your office should generally not release documents in response to a request for voluntary production of documents. Generally, absent a judicial warrant or other court order, or subpoena, there is no requirement for elections officials to disrupt the election process to accommodate such a request.

C. Letter requests for documents or information

If you receive a letter from federal law enforcement requesting documents or information:

- Promptly contact your counsel and notify the OSOS and the AGO.
- You do not need to respond to the letter directly without clear direction from your legal counsel. Your counsel should handle communications with the law enforcement agency.
- The OSOS and the AGO are always available to consult with you and your counsel about whether and how to respond to the letter request.

D. Subpoenas

Subpoenas can be an administrative subpoena (see Attachment A) issued directly by the agency, a judicial subpoena, or a grand jury subpoena (Attachment B).

Generally, subpoenas do not require election officials to immediately provide access to election locations or materials. Prosecutors may issue “forthwith subpoenas” that demand immediate access, but such cases are rare.

If you receive a subpoena:

- Contact your counsel promptly. Your counsel should handle communications with the law enforcement agency.
- Notify the OSOS and the AGO unless it is a grand jury subpoena that explicitly includes a non-disclosure requirement.
- If you are asked to sign for the subpoena or if the subpoena is sent by certified mail, make a copy (or take a picture) of the signed receipt and the date of the receipt.
- Forward the subpoena, the envelope for the subpoena, and any copies/pictures of the subpoena receipt to your counsel.
- Make a plan with your counsel and the OSOS to either respond to or contest the subpoena.

E. Federal searches of voting centers/facilities

Federal officials or agents may also seek to access or search voting facilities, including county voting centers, where eligible voters may register in person, obtain a provisional ballot, or cast their vote in person, RCW 29A.40.160.

To execute a search without consent, federal agents are required to obtain a search warrant, supported by probable cause, and approved by a federal magistrate judge. Election workers must allow the search to proceed immediately if federal agents provide a judicial warrant (Attachment C) or other court order; a subpoena that directs materials be provided “forthwith.”

If served with a warrant, immediately contact your legal counsel and send them a copy of the search warrant. Also notify the OSOS and the AGO.

Do not interfere with federal agents. Do not block access, attempt to delay the search while you call your counsel, hide files, shut down computers, or move documents.

These actions can be viewed as potential interference.

Ask agents if you can designate a staff member to:

- observe,
- document, and
- photograph or record (if possible)

what is occurring and what is being taken. This staff member should only observe, not interfere. The agents may deny the request. If so, you can ask the name of the agent who declined the request and make note of the request and denial.

Tip! Taking an inventory of election-related materials now, along with regularly backing up files, will help you determine what materials are seized in the event of a search. This inventory can be very helpful in seeking the return of election-related materials that are improperly seized.

You are entitled to a copy of the search warrant. You are not legally required to allow federal agents or other officials to enter non-public areas of an election office or take election-related materials without a warrant signed by a federal judge. In all likelihood, you will not be provided a copy of any statement describing the probable cause that supports the warrant.

You may ask for the lead agent's name and for identity verification by showing official governmental ID.

Federal agents are only lawfully authorized to take what is listed on the warrant. Contact your counsel for any questions regarding the scope of the warrant or if you believe that federal agents are seizing materials that are not included in the warrant. Do not obstruct the agents.

Federal agents may ask for your consent to exceed the scope of the warrant. You are not required to consent. You can inform law enforcement agents that you will cooperate with the warrant but that you do not consent to any searches beyond the scope of the subpoena.

Tip! Counties can mitigate the risk of federal searches by being proactive in abiding by federal and state retention schedules for election-related materials and conducting periodic inventories of physical and electronic files.

If agents appear to be seizing privileged material, such as communications between you and your counsel, you can politely inform them of this fact. You can ask the agents not to take the materials until your counsel has verified the material is not privileged. If agents decline your request, you can ask for the name of the agent who declined and take note of the declination.

Before agents leave, you can ask for an inventory of items seized and a copy of the search warrant (if you have not received it yet).

After agents leave, make a plan with your counsel on appropriate legal action (if any) and statements to the public. Be sure to contact the OSOS and the AGO, so the offices can consider taking legal action to seek the return of any improperly seized material.

Federal officials in/around voting locations

As noted above, elections officials may encounter individuals who claim to be federal employees, officials, or law enforcement.

Regardless, federal laws prohibit interference with elections and voting — e.g., 18 U.S.C. § 245 (intimidation and threats by government official when voting), 18 U.S.C. § 242 (willful deprivation of civil rights), and 52 U.S.C. § 10307(a) (refusal to permit an eligible voter from voting).

If federal agents circle or enter voting centers, or surround ballot boxes, there may be immediate legal action you can take, including seeking a temporary restraining order against the action. Do not interfere or impede federal agents.

Immediately notify the OSOS and the AGO so that our offices are aware of the issue and can support you. We may also have an independent basis to take legal action to protect voters and our state's election systems.

Be prepared to document what is going on and its impact on voting, such as:

- photographs,
- videos,
- observers willing to provide declarations regarding the activity, and
- voters willing to sign declarations about the effect of creating fear and intimidation.

County election officials should coordinate with their prosecuting attorneys to identify legal steps to respond to attempts to interfere with Washington's elections.

Topics to discuss include:

- The legal differences between judicially authorized warrants, grand jury subpoenas, administrative subpoenas, and other documents.
- How to challenge warrants and subpoenas and obtain the return of seized materials.
- Legal prohibitions on obstructing federal investigations.

Other federal actions

Public reports indicate that the federal administration has considered other actions that could affect election administration, such as declaring an emergency ban on the use of some voting machines and “nationalizing” elections.¹ The precise actions the federal administration may take are not currently clear. Some of the potential actions that have been discussed would be unprecedented, and county officials should be in close contact with their counsel, the OSOS, and the AGO, should any of these actions occur, however unlikely:

A. Seizing voting machines or sanctioning voting machine manufacturers under IEEPA

If the federal administration attempts to use emergency powers under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act (IEEPA) to manufacture an “emergency” related to elections and seize voting machines, the OSOS will work with the Attorney General’s Office and legal team to determine our course of action. We will communicate our efforts and associated timelines with county election officials.

B. Executive Orders taking power away from state or local officials

Under the Constitution, the states have the right to supervise and oversee elections, not a single federal administration. There have been efforts over the past several years – such as through Executive Orders – to take away those rights, and in each instance, the AGO has taken swift legal action to protect Washington’s election systems. The AGO will continue to closely coordinate with the OSOS to evaluate the legal, constitutional, and practical implications of any future Executive Order, and will provide prompt information to local election officials of any actions taken.

C. U.S. Postal Service operations

While the federal administration has no authority to unilaterally regulate elections, the administration does oversee the U.S. Postal Service (USPS). This may have an outsize impact on Washington state, which operates an elections process where voters receive and may return their ballots by mail. Thus, changes to USPS operations may negatively impact voters. This could include intentional interference, such as restricting USPS’s ability to deliver or return ballots of certain voters. It also includes recent changes that create delays in applying postmarks to mail, including ballots returned by mail.

The OSOS and the AGO have worked collaboratively to file litigation and will continue to vigorously protect our state’s vote-by-mail system.

To mitigate risk, counties can emphasize early ballot return and use of official ballot drop boxes, and encourage voters to utilize available ballot status tracking tools and election resources.

D. Deployment of military or other federal law enforcement

Federal laws bar the armed forces, including federalized National Guard, from participating in civilian law enforcement activities without express authorization from Congress. That is for good reason — states and local governments capably operate and oversee their own law enforcement operations. With regard to elections, federal law is explicit that federal armed forces and federal law enforcement should be kept out of polling places to protect voter freedom and prevent intimidation.

When acting under state authority, governors may deploy Guard members for general election security, such as protecting election infrastructure or responding to emergencies. But if federalized, the National Guard becomes subject to the same restrictions as members of the military.

The Insurrection Act, 10 U.S.C. §§ 251-255, does allow the president to deploy members of the federal armed forces and/or federalized National Guard personnel in extreme circumstances, such as to:

- Suppress insurrections or respond to civil unrest in a state at the request of the state governor.
- Suppress rebellions against the federal government.
- Assist with the execution of federal law, under certain narrow circumstances, when federal civilian authorities are overwhelmed and unable to do so on their own.

Using this authority to intimidate voters, or to influence certain election outcomes, would be unprecedented.

Governor's authority over the Washington National Guard

Under Washington law, the Governor serves as commander-in-chief of the Washington National Guard when it is not in federal service. The Governor exercises authority over the organized militia through the Adjutant General and the Washington Military Department. (RCW 38.08.020 and RCW 38.08.040)

Washington law authorizes the Governor to activate the Guard in response to a wide range of emergencies and public safety concerns, including:

- War, insurrection, rebellion, invasion, riot, or civil disorder.
- Imminent threats to life, property, or public order.
- Public disasters or emergencies.
- Failures or anticipated failures of civil authorities to maintain order.
- Other circumstances impacting public health, safety, or welfare.

The Governor may also activate the Guard to support preparedness, response, and recovery efforts related to such events.

In 2025, Governor Ferguson signed legislation restricting the deployment of out-of-state armed forces into Washington without the Governor's permission, except where otherwise required under federal law. The legislation was intended to reinforce state authority over military activities occurring within Washington.

Washington has previously utilized the National Guard in support roles related to election security and emergency response. Following the 2024 Clark County ballot drop box arson incident, then-Governor Inslee activated the Washington National Guard in temporary state active-duty status as a precaution to support state election security operations if needed.
